Link to this page: * "Objection, vague," or "objection, ambiguous"--Before most of the depositions, the interrogating lawyer typically explains some basic rules for the deponent. One of those basic rules is almost always something to the effect of: "If you don't understand my questions, please tell me and I'll answer the question." Despite this instruction, it is common for the lawyer who defends the deposition of objecting on the basis that the application is "vaga".(38) Instead of applying the standard of rule 26(c)(1), the tribunals applying the apex doctrine require the party to search for deposition to (1) show that the putative deponent possesses "unity or higher" and often "first hand" relevant knowledge and (2) prove that he pursued all other "less" At one deposition there are usually two lawyers, the deponent and a legal transcript; sometimes there is only one videograph; occasionally a transcriptor and a videograph. The court reporter retains a copy of the documents provided to the deponent during the deposition for the document identification questions. Some verbs, such as "sequ" (to follow), use the corresponding forms of other verbs to express a true passive meaning. Synthetic verbs also have periphrastic forms, for use in perfect and in simple tenses in which they are deponent. However, most of them have lost this meaning so historicallyThey are as defonent verbs. The verbs are conjugated in three people, two numbers (singular, plural, plural), Voices (active, passive, deponent), three moods (indicative, conjunctive, imperative), and four theses (present, future, imperfect, pretending). The incorrect sheet allows the deponent to make any changes that make changes in the form or substance, giving the possibility of changing their records from the original transcript.
