The rate of depression in people with diabetes is much higher than the general population. Women experience depression about double as men, and the risk of depression increases in women with diabetes. Many hormonal factors can contribute to the increase in the depression rate in women: changes in the menstrual cycle pregnancy charges Postpartum pre-menopause period menopause many women also face additional stress, such as responsibility both at work and on the house, unique parenthood and care For children and elderly parents. Previous studies have demonstrated individuals who are insulin-resistant can have higher serotonin concentrations and can be more prone to depression and even to suicide. Furthermore, women with diabetes may be more likely to suffer depression due to clinical diagnosis. Types of depression The major depression is characterized by a combination of symptoms that interfere with the capacity to work, study, sleep, eat and enjoy a pleasant activity. Distress, a less serious type of depression, involves long-term chronic symptoms that do not detoxify, but prevent it from working well or feeling good. Bipolar disorder (also known as manic-depressive disease) is almost prevalent as other forms of depression. Seasonal affective disorder (SAD) is an important depression that occurs in winter when the quantity of sunlight is limited. PostPartum depression occurs within four weeks of childbirth. Most of the new mothers suffer from some form of "blue children". Psychotic depression is a rare form of depression characterized by delusions or hallucinations, how to believe that you are someone who is not and feel voices.
