StoryPeople Gun Gallery once would have raised a toast to the song of a traveler who was so sung: "If someone pulls out your tongue, you can still see with your ears." "If someone conspires to destroy tomorrow, then raise them a glass, "Even if tomorrow dies, this song will live. "They say that the character of a region follows that of its archon, and that this applies both to the people and to the earth itself. But was it the infected archeon that gave a love for freedom and wine on earth and people in the midst of the conflict? Or was it the people who nurtured the love of the freedom of Anemo Archon, as it stuck for it amidst the wind and the ice? This is a question that can no longer be answered. But that song is often sung in dark times. If in the days when Decarabian reigned from his gale-crowned tower, or when corrupt nobility reversed the likeness of archon, In the cloistered cellars, in dark alleys, and in the decrepit taverns, the song saw through the prison and iron fist of tyranny, and became a hymn to resist the heroes. In the distant past, in a quiet city rang from all sides, Cheers erupts at the sound of a and at last pierced the prison with raging winds. A certain group, made up of a youth, a spirit, an archer, a knight and a warrior with flaming hair wandering about, came and found himself the tower that hung like a spear to the sky, casting a shadow like a titan, and they swore to be free, and they swore to break the rule of the lone tyrant of the tower. The weak and infirm who could not climb the tower instead sang the song that, until now, had never been whispered only in corners where the wind did not reach, And that the drinking song rose with enough force to shake the walls of the city, spurring the heroes on how they climbed... "If someone sticks your tongue out, you can still see with your ears." But if someone dares to steal your song, the freedom you desire, "That's all, that alone will never do!"
