Link: Go for verbal travel times are difficult elements of work of English tongue, and we use them every day when speaking, write and read. But sometimes, understand exactly how they work can be a bit confused. Here is a quick guide to help you understand the times in English Gramatics. The times verbs help us describe when and how the different actions occur and the different things happened. In some cases, you can use several times in a single sentence, for example if you said: "I worked for six years, but now I'll be working somewhere else." In this sentence, you are using the simple last tense and the future tense continuing. It may seem confusing the principle, but remember, you probably uses all these times naturally in your daily speech. Remembering your names is just a matter of practical and memorization. The present time, as you must have guessed, refers to things that are happening now. If someone asks where you live and answer, "I live in New York," you just used the present time. All time can take on four forms: The simple, the container, the perfect and perfect continuing. An example of simple present would be your response, "I live in New York." If you were to use this container, you can say, "I'm living in New York now." If you used the perfect gift, you would say, "I lived in New York for several years." And finally, if you wanted to use the perfect continuous gift, you could say, "I have lived in New York for a long time." If you sat down to tell a friend about everything you did today, you would probably say to this story in the past, because you are talking about events that have happened and now they are in the past. So, if you tell your friend, "I fixed the park," you're using simple time. If you say, "I was tired," you're using past continuing. If you say, "I had only gone a mile," you're using the perfect time of the past. And finally, if you conclude, "I was awake for hours the night before," you're using perfect container. Finally, when we discuss things that will happen or that we think it will happen, we use future time. For example, if someone tells you "it will rain this afternoon", this is the simple future. If they say, "It will be raining soon," this is a future Container. If they say "he will rain tonight", this is perfect. And if they say, "He will have rained for hours," that is (you guessed) Future Container Perfect. You can use different shapes of the same time in a single season of phrases and maintain clarity. But can you use two completely different times in the same sentence? The answer is yes. Look again in the example above: "I worked there for six years, but now I'll be working somewhere else." past and future blend without perfectly in this case. But in some cases, you want to stay with a single tense. You do not want to want Write: "George left his house. He jumps in a taxi and had traveled for six miles by noon." Understanding verbal times helps you build phrases that clearly receive your point. Actively check the features of the device for identification. Use accurate geolocalization data.
