4.4 Discussion of Results

The result for this investigation was very interesting mainly because really didn’t follow the trend stated in the hypothesis, as seen in figure 4.1.1 the test with about 20mL of vinegar had the least amount of precipitate. Where as the test with the most amount of precipitate had the least amount of vinegar. This would suggest that the lower the acidity of the ocean the higher the precipitation around the black smokers. The reason behind why less acidity forms more precipitate could be due to a number of factors, including the fact that there is less vinegar, in this case, getting in the way of the reaction between the Iron Chloride and Bi-Carb Soda or perhaps it is simply the fact that this particular chemical reaction prefers more basic environments.

4.6 Conclusion

In conclusion the aim was able to be replicate the reaction between the sulphides from the black smoker and cold ocean water. This was able to be replicated as the bi-card soda dissolved in the iron chloride and became precipitate which then build up and create an 'ore' fit for mining.

5. Evaluation

In this investigation I've been able to learn many things one of them being how to work more collaboratively with other business units, how black smokers black smokers work and how the sulfides from the black smoker plume dissolve in the water and the fact that they precipitate and become solids that then build up and become ore suitable for mining.

If I had to do anything differently, I would’ve recorded continuous temperature data to see if there was any correlation between the temperature of the iron chloride and the amount of precipitation produced, I would have started with already heated water as that would better simulate the ocean environment to see if that would have made any difference. Lastly, when calculating the amount of precipitation, I would’ve taken to account the fact that I need to account for the surface area of the circular surface of the soda bottle.
