After the sort of deliberation, I would say vehemently agrees with the basics of your conviction and share your ideas on such premise. My nodding enthusiastically says it all. I love you so much, you just agree with everything you say, you deserve a standing ovation standing for that idea. There's a small chance you're wrong, you deserve a round applause. Yes, my Liège. Because of the lady of an error on your part, I am forced to launch my bag with you. I rested to yes, but but in it for me? I was hoping you could ask. I'll just put my life on the line for you. I accept with all my heart your conclusion as plausible. The smile on my face says everything! Go ahead, I listen intensely. I firmly believe that our opinions on the subject at hand are very similar. You'll be sorry to ask me this. You're kidding me! You're perfect 10! The answer is a clamorous yes! ricky kharawala, cc0, via unsplashinayaya on April 24, 2020: me: ... Sirius black: are deadddddddme: ummm ... because it must be be beeeee when someone asks you to perform a task, there are many ways to say yes. Yes, for one. there are also yes, yes, yes, yes, ya, yea, bet, okay, all right, absolutely, of course, gladly, sounds good, will do it, no problem, aye aye, roger, totally, sure, and , if you are a truck driver, 10-4.then, there is my less favored statement in absolute: Sure. do not be confused with â€ œsures thing ... (folksy, casual) or i;1/2i;1/2 for certain loose, lapidated,) sure is a word that makes my skin sting, my eye contracts. sure is oato as "Yes," although it never means: "Yes". Sure is a thumb to the face and a jerkoff movement behind the back. Surely says "I do. It's a butthole. À "Everyone has a word like this everywhere. a collaborator told me that once he almost left the job because someone answered - â€ œekâ€ a request he made. (there was even more there, but "K" is an act of war. I don't blame you.) maybe the word that puts you out is - â€ œYa â€ â€â€ Those can be annoying words. I agree, but my word is â€ œSURE.À ê imagine this scenario. Your friend is throwing a small party, and mentions lazily needs someone to bring the paper plates. You, being a good friend, offer to do so, but he does not say â€ œthank you. ...! â€ œsure, â€œ reply, the word bland dribbling from his fingers and in the text message. Sure, you can do it for him if you want. If you have to, I suppose. a guide to moral alignment of every affirmative phrase. jeremy gordonhere is another scenario. being supervised by a junior employee at work and ask if he can perform a minor task for you by the end of the day. the task is not in all complicated â€ œis part of his work, and you gave him more than time more than time. In fact, allowing him to concentrate on this small work, in practice allow him to afford the coast through the day only to do so, but he does not say "make â€œ" or ... â€ œ"or â€ œCool.À» à «Susage, â€œ" answers, the apathy that it exudes. I will go to it. Yeah, it's something he can do if he makes you happy if he has to. Why are you going in his case? Here?scenario. You're a dog sitting for a friend. (Not the friend who organized the party.) After days of absence, your friend comes back and asks if he can pick up his dog at six in the evening. "I won't be around, then," you say. (You have a job.) "We can say 7?" "Cert", he says. 6 would be better, but 7 is fine, if necessary. It'd be easier for him if he was before, but if 7 is better for you, then it's fine. You, who hosted his dog for several days, brought him in the rain, clean the poop from the floor, your needs deserve nothing but a passing nod. But she'll let you give him the dog back at 7:00, whatever. I don't expect everyone to be always excited. It would obviously be false, or at least useless. Of course, it slaps the tense hand, presented as the intent of community and collaboration. Surely consider the offer made in good faith and says: "You're bothering me." It takes the view that the question really means "fucked" and responds "fucked" in a similar way. It's the automatic response in a world where generosity and kindness don't count. It is another thing: Dictionary.com says that «safe» comes from Latin for «free from care». Dictionary.com does not mention it from Latin for "free from the fuck of you, son of a bitch. »
